Improving sanitation Improving sanitation has a big impact on public safety. Although sanitation cannot prevent all diseases from spreading through their environment, sanitation provides sanitation solutions that allow healthy individuals to reach their full potential; thus enabling them to get the nutrients they need for health and physical functions. When they are located close to hospitals, for example, hospitals provide a lot of medical care and have clean water. Therefore, sanitation provides additional services. If it wasn't for the lack of basic services, diseases may spread more effectively, as people may choose not to get involved in medical care because it is cheaper, and it will save them time and energy.. The WHO suggests several approaches to building a public sanitation system that will help prevent diseases. For example, by providing drinking water in areas with poor sanitation, hospitals can improve patient access to safe drinking water and treatment, as well as access and treatment facilities by reducing health hazards for patients. Water access has several important benefits such as reducing illnesses and deaths due to water shortages, protecting pregnant women from risks that come in the long run from the stress of having baby by water..
